It is a fact that the world's population is growing at an alarming rate. In 1950, there were about 2.5 billion people on the earth. By 1980, the population had increased to about 4.5 billion. And by the year 2000, it is estimated that there will be over 6 billion people. This rapid increase in population has led to many problems, including overcrowding, pollution, and the depletion of natural resources. One of the most serious problems is the shortage of food. As the population grows, the demand for food increases. But the land used for farming is being lost at a rapid rate. This is because of the need for more space for cities and industry. As a result, the world's food supply is in danger. If we do not find a way to increase food production, there will be a famine. This is why it is so important to find ways to control the population. One way to do this is by encouraging people to have fewer children. Another way is by improving the health care system so that more people can live longer, healthier lives. If we can control the population, we can avoid many of the problems that are facing the world today.

Women are more likely to be employed and work less and earn less than their male counterparts, a statistic that's often cited as evidence of discrimination. But it's also a sign of progress. Most female workers in the United States have a college degree, and most have a job that requires a college degree. And the gender wage gap is closing. In 1990, women earned 75 percent of what men earned. In 2000, they earned 82 percent. In 2010, they earned 85 percent.
